Nova Gorica was created as a substitute for the lost heart of Gorizia, which was connected to Italy after the Second World War. In this period the Yugoslavian and Slovenian architects design the urban forms promoted by CIAM in the Athens Charter; influenced by the urban planning theories of Le Corbusier and Bauhaus. The idea of a new center of Gorizia in the fall of 1947 started to be implemented by a special committee headed by Ivan Maček - Matija. The urban plan was made by architect and urban planner Edvard Ravnikar, changed and revised several times. In the process of defining the concept of new city urban plan there were important also other authors: arch. Marko Zupančič (1947), arch. Božidar Gvardiančič (1948) and Viljem Strmečki (1958). The foundation stone for construction was laid on 13 June 1948. Youth brigades from all over Yugoslavia started to build a new city. First they created the so-called "Russian blocks", the municipal building and the Skyscraper. The first buildings were important for building the identity of the new town with new inhabitants. The Municipal Hall was one of the elements which were never changed; it represented a consistency in the growth of the city. Later a central bank, library and the cultural centre were built in the vicinity. The scale relation has remained the same until today.
